Role of Love in Relationship Satisfaction

Rahmat Kaur Kochar¹, Dr. Daisy Sharma^{2*}

ABSTRACT

Adolescent romantic relationships are marked by feelings, thoughts, or behaviors within a relationship and have been found to be associated with intimacy, passion, commitment, sexual attitudes, trust, dependence and communication. The present research is based on studying the relationship between love and relationship satisfaction of adolescents. For this purpose, Sternberg's Triangular Love Scale and Relationship Assessment Scale were administered on a sample of 100 adolescents (age=18-22 years). Correlation was applied which showed that a significant positive correlation exists between the types of love and relationship satisfaction. The t-test revealed that no gender differences were found in their types of love and in their relationship satisfaction. The thematic analysis done using a semi-structured interview revealed that gender differences exist between intimacy and passion of adolescents.

Keywords: Romantic Relationships, Intimacy, Passion, Commitment, Relationship Satisfaction.

The presence of love is an imperative element of a successful relationship. Love is a combination of emotions, cognitions, and behaviors that often plays a crucial role in intimate romantic relationships. Researchers have always been interested in this topic and have widely worked upon almost every aspect of an intimate love relationship. Various researchers have defined love like Freud defined love as "the frustrated desire" (1922/1951), where as in 1924 Watson defined love as erogenous stimulation.

Theories of love:

Lee color wheel: In 1973, Lee proposed the Typology Love Theory which consists of six such love styles, divided into the category of primary and secondary love styles. The primary love style consists of: i) Eros (the passionate love); ii) Ludus (the game playing love); iii) Storage (the friendship love). The secondary love style consists of: i) Mania (the possessive love), combination of Eros and Ludus; ii) Agape (the selfless love), combination of Eros and Storge (Lee, 1988); iii)Pragma (the realistic and practical love), is the combination of Storge and Ludus (Lee, 1988).

Sternberg Triangular model of love: Robert J. Sternberg (1986) proposed the triangular model of love which is composed of three elements i.e. Intimacy (top vertex of the triangle), Passion
