Understanding George's Paper Business in A Hero of Our Time

Throughout the novel A Hero of Our Time, by Mikhail Lermontov, Lermontov uses characters in order to criticize the general population's view and understanding of Grigory Pechorin. One of the characters I believe this is most applicable to is Miron Matveevich. In the past, while serving as a Pior near Kazan (Volga, Mordovia), Pechorin had been good friends. In 1810, we see that Miron told Pechorin to work high-ranks that is not his own interests, honorable, social figure. This character contrasts with his thoughts on Pechorin at the end of the chapter Miron Matveevich, at which point he realizes these ideas were unreal and founded in blind optimism. In the beginning of Miron Matveevich, Miron gets confused at the thought of seeing his old dear friend whom he once held in such, only to be slowly let down when he sees how differently Pechorin is. At this point Miron goes to a state of expressing optimism at seeing Pechorin, being he does, then recapping his old optimism. As Miron goes through more of these "optimistic cycles" his physical movement becomes mirroring his progressively more pessimistic views on Pechorin. This cycle shows relationship between Miron's decreasing physical movement and his increasingly pessimistic views reveal Lermontov's criticism of Pechorin's claimed respect of Pechorin.

In the beginning of Miron Matveevich, Miron's initial optimistic movements reveals his overly optimistic and romantic view of Pechorin. What Miron encountered
